Introduction

The Graduate School of Science and Technology Policy (STP) is an interdisciplinary program to advance policy-relevant knowledge about global and local issues where science, technology, and public policy intersect. Established in 2008, the STP offers courses leading to the degree of Master of Science or Master of Engineering, which normally involves two years of graduate work, and it also plans to establish a Ph.D. program within a few years. The STP accepts students with diverse background in science and engineering fields, as well as humanities and social sciences.
